Note: RHET-2246-050 - We're living in the midst of an epoch-making media revolution today, as screens and images displace the printed text from whence came the culture of the book. Will book culture disintegrate, or become dangerously enfeebled? Will an image-based culture advance the Enlightenment project or drastically curtail it? Will entertainment overwhelm education? Will learning and individuality and democracy thrive in the new electronic culture, or will they suffer catastrophic regressions? We'll try to answer these questions as we survey the major media in human history.

Note: RHET-2250-001 - This course examines the relationship between the rise of new media and the emergence of popular culture. The course looks at changing rhetorics of taste, from the nineteenth to the twentieth century, as new media made art and culture more widely accessible to a broader public. The course considers how the new processes of mediated distribution of art changed the way we understand popular culture, today. Topics in this course include: the rise of photography and the technological reproducibility of images; mass media and the culture industry; technology and globalization; augmented reality, video games, and the relationship between media and the body.

Note: RHET-3156-050 - The course looks at the origins and development of language from a historical perspective and moves into specific case studies of unilingual, bilingual, and multilingual groups, their languages, how they communicate, and representational media used by the group. We focus closely on how groups communicate with one another, often by using common languages and the practice of translation, and how groups use languages to represent their culture to other groups and within the group. Central to such transnational and intercultural communication is the representation of identity and heritage, and therefore as languages change, identity changes also occur.

Rhetoric and Communications

Note: RHET-3340-001 - Ever wonder what Canadian Tire might say on Twitter? Ever wonder how PowerPoint contributed to the Challenger disaster? In this course, we'll look at everything from policy statements to press releases to understand the theories behind organizational communication and how they are used (sometimes well, sometimes not) in practice.

Start Date: Sep 5, 2017		End Date: Nov 30, 2017			TuTh	11:30 - 12:45	MAN	3M64

Note: RHET-3350-001 - This course focuses on contemporary theories of ideology and the reproduction of ideological hegemony in the media. Using examples from contemporary media, including the internet, new media, and social media, the course focuses on the different ways that modern mass media use rhetoric, language, discourse, and images to reproduce existing relations of power, exploitation, and domination. The course also considers the relationship between the media and counter-hegemonic discourses. Topics include (but are not limited to): media and subjectivity; media and social class; ideologies of race, gender, and sexuality; and alternative media and struggles for resistance to power.
