ANTHROPOLOGY

Anthropology is the study of humankind, our nature as biological, cultural, and social beings, and the changes in our ways of life from earliest times to the present day.

Well-known anthropologists include Margaret Mead, famous for her work in Samoan and New Guinea cultures, and Jane Goodall, who has made significant discoveries about primate societies. If you are interested in human biological evolution, in ancient societies, or in the diversity of peoples, cultures and languages in the contemporary world, anthropology is a good area of study for you.

At The University of Winnipeg, you can concentrate on cultural anthropology, linguistics, archaeology, or biological anthropology—or you may choose an integrated program that includes all four areas. Practical experience is available through field schools as well as hands-on methods courses.

This program leads to a Bachelor of Arts degree (3-year, 4-year, or Honours).

Also, please see related fact sheets on “Bioanthropology” and “Interdisciplinary Linguistics.”

SAMPLE CAREERS

A major in anthropology can lead to careers in museums and cultural heritage organizations, governmental and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), and in teaching, among others. Anthropology courses are also useful if you are interested in entering careers in fields as diverse as health, law, business, information science, resource conservation, international development, and minority and ethnic relations.

SAMPLE COURSES

Introductory Anthropology is a first-year course that surveys the discipline’s main areas of specialization: archaeology, cultural anthropology, linguistics, and biological anthropology. The course covers a wide range of topics in each area, including the fossil evidence of our early ancestors, the origins and development of technology, the relationship between language and culture, and the customs and beliefs that define everyday life in societies around the world.

Archaeology of North America is a second-year course that surveys the archaeology of North American Indigenous peoples before European contact.

Myth, Magic, and Shamanism is a second-year course that focuses on conceptions of nature, humanity, and the supernatural in religions of Western and non-Western Societies.

Introduction to Forensic Anthropology covers methods used in the investigation of crime, including the analysis of skeletal remains and DNA evidence.
