Early German-Indigenous Relations in Eastern North America

Dr. Andrew Zonderman

Postdoctoral Fellow in German-Canadian Studies at The University of Winnipeg

Learn how connections between German immigrants and Indigenous Peoples shaped the settlement process in the eighteenth-century government-planned townships of New York, Nova Scotia, and South Carolina as Dr. Andrew Zonderman shares his research into how settler colonialist impulses, and the desire for economic security, led thousands of migrants to take increasingly hostile attitudes toward Indigenous peoples, and how these stories reframe enduring narratives crafted by German nationalist and Enlightenment writers of this period.
