Making Transformations

Transformation happens every day in classrooms on campus—when professors communicate ideas to students and when students reciprocate with views of their own. A light bulb goes on, a perspective changes, an action is made, and a transformation begins.

This issue of the Journal is dedicated to these kinds of transformations. You'll read about how award-winning faculty members make the connection in the classroom and how many of our graduates go on to share their unique ideas with the world.

With this issue, we've also embarked on a transformation of our own. By launching a new design and featuring more stories on alumni and faculty, we've tried to make a more attractive and engaging magazine for all alumni. A special thanks to Managing Editor Paula Denbow for her contributions to this issue.

We hope you enjoy the Journal and welcome your feedback on our transformation. Please write, call, or e-mail us with your comments.

On Liberal Education

The core mission of the University of Winnipeg is liberal education—the kind that invites and inspires students to explore the broad sweep of what the world is about and how variously their fellow human beings have sought, and continue to seek, meaning and understanding within it.

Liberal education embraces the arts and humanities, social science, and science. Its greatest gifts include the development of our powers of empathy, critical thinking, and communication.

Through lively, engaged contact with the ideas and experiences of others, past and present, our students grow and change. They open themselves to the world and, by paying attention to what is outside of the self and other than the self, they become larger, more capable, curious, and caring people.

The torch of civilization is passed on. This is rather a grand thing to say, but it is also the simple truth. Our students become—as we all need to become—both more and other, holding on to some core of self and value while at the same time flying out from that core and changing shape, over and over again.

I believe in liberal education NOW because it helps us toward that crucial balancing act. It is a call to action and to personal and social transformation. It is the platform upon which any form of lasting progress is erected and upon which social cohesion must rest. But it is also a place of refreshment in which the core of self and value is reaffirmed.

The transformation of the self through encounters with others and with new ideas, if we're lucky, goes on for a lifetime. But the undergraduate years occupy a special place in that continuum all the same—or they did for me. I suspect this has something to do with just how sophisticated we are (or are not!) in this period of our lives, and also with taking the time to fall in love with the process of learning for its own sake.

As the new knowledge comes flooding in, we feel our capacities growing by leaps and bounds. We feel ourselves changing, I think, more rapidly and more dramatically than at any other time. We get ready for more than we had dreamed possible.

Liberal education is urgently needed at this stage because the whole person is still filling out. All the basic “food groups” that supply and shape us—humanities, social science, science—are critical then, to build the strong bones (the solid foundation) upon which successful lifelong learning will depend. I believe also that an adventurous, wide-ranging diet gives students a chance to discover where their true passions lie.

There is so much more to say about all of this, especially now—but what I would really like is to hear from you.

President and Vice-Chancellor

Opening Doors

FOR THE LEADERS OF TOMORROW

"Leaders aren't born—they're created," asserts alumna Rosa Walker (Class of 1990). This belief drives Walker in her efforts to give tomorrow's leaders the tools and opportunities they need to succeed. She admits that the opportunity to participate in a course offered by Harvard University or the University of Winnipeg can seem worlds away for many people in Canada's Aboriginal community. But she is committed to bridging that gap by bringing university courses to the doorsteps of those who did not think it was possible.

She has travelled a long and, at times, difficult road turning her vision into reality. It's a road Walker continues to travel, sharing the gift of education as the founding Executive Director of the Aboriginal Leadership Institute. "With the help of some of the best post-secondary institutions, we're working to build better community leaders by providing them with the tools they need to succeed," she says. "The launching phase of this project has been a lot of work, but it's also been very rewarding. It's a beautiful idea that has really caught on and I'm happy to have played a part."

“Leaders aren’t born— they’re created.”

Walker has done much more than “play a part” in getting this virtual institution off the ground. She has been instrumental in establishing the partnerships, locating the funding, and creating a framework in which to operate the national program, which is run from a small but busy two-person office just off the corner of Portage and Main.

Established in April of 1999, the non-profit organization is dedicated to building the leadership capacity of Canadian Aboriginal people. In partnership with leading educational institutions, such as Harvard University and the University of Arizona in the United States, and the University of Winnipeg and Carleton University in Canada, the institute offers courses based on needs identified by Aboriginal leaders and planners. The institute boasts a calendar of 20 classes, each with a capacity of 30 students. Course participants are typically band chiefs, band counselors, administrators, and senior executives of Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal organizations. Spots are held in every class for Aboriginal youth and women to ensure a cross-section of community members are on hand to exchange ideas.

Adding to the uniqueness of the program, courses are not only offered on the campuses of the partnering schools but also within the communities of Aboriginal groups. Whenever possible, courses are fully or partially sponsored by public or private partners.

Education has always been important to Walker, the former Managing Director of Workforce Diversity for the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs. She graduated from the University of Winnipeg with a double major in Anthropology and Public Administration. Prior to that, she spent two years at Confederation College in Thunder Bay, Ontario. “Moving away from your home where the whole world is the same colour as you and you’re part of the majority, to a place where you are part of the minority, is not easy,” she explains. She adds that in her case, home was Peguis First Nation, a community of 6,000. “That’s why I believe so strongly in programs like the Aboriginal Leadership Institute. They help bridge the cultural differences and open the door for people with goals—whether that’s attending university or taking a specialty course to help further the needs of their community.”

While Walker readily admits that piloting an initiative of this scope in its initial stages can be a bit overwhelming, she’s also quick to point out that the rewards make it all worthwhile. “The feedback we get from the class participants is what keeps me going,” says Walker. “Our classes are always full, which tells me that people are interested in learning.”

With the institute still in its infancy, Walker’s main priority is making this project a staple of the Aboriginal educational community. “There are about two million Aboriginals in Canada and we’re only touching about 500 each year, so there’s definitely more work to do,” says Walker. “All the stakeholders believe in the concept and the value in what we have created. Our challenge now is to build on what we’ve started.” ■

ROSA WALKER: TAKING CHARGE

The Aboriginal Leadership Institute is not the first program Walker has helped get off the ground. She played an integral role in the launch of the highly acclaimed Taking Charge!, a project to help single parents on social assistance become self-sufficient.

The program officially opened its doors in April of 1996. Today, Taking Charge! has provided training, academic, skill-specific, or general life skills to more than 3,000 people. “It’s the project I’ve been most proud of,” says the modest Walker. Her involvement with the program played a key role in her earning a YM-YWCA Women of Distinction Award in 1999.

“Not everyone has a chance to go to university but that doesn’t mean those people don’t have something to offer,” says Walker. “There’s something to be said for the value of life learning as well. Taking Charge! helps those people recognize that they do have a role to play in society.”

Walker also served as Employment Equity Coordinator for the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs in the mid-90s. Before that, she was a member of the Taskforce on Aboriginal Employment and the Taskforce on Employment for People with Disabilities. Walker served as a Parole Officer for the Correctional Service of Canada and was a Probation Officer with the Community and Youth Corrections program.

ONE GRADUATE'S VIEWS ON WAR AND PEACE

TEXT: Paula Denbow

Jackie Hogue is currently pursuing an MA at the University of Bradford.

The students express their worries and fears through their stark artwork.

> One day she was hanging out with her friends at a café in Osborne Village. The next she was on a plane to war-torn Lebanon where her life would be changed forever. Jackie Hogue (Class of 1998), a graduate of the International Development Studies (IDS) program at Menno Simons College, left the safety of her home in Winnipeg to pursue work as a peace activist. While teaching English to Arabic students and offering solidarity to the people of Lebanon during the Israeli occupation, she earned academic credits toward her IDS degree. Now completing her MA in Peace Studies at the University of Bradford in England, Hogue reflects—via e-mail—on a year that altered her view of the world and her place in it.

> Paula: When you found out that the IDS practicum coordinator had placed you in Lebanon, what was your reaction?

> Jackie: I thought the Middle East was one of the last places I want to go. In light of how much I love it now, it's pretty amusing to remember those feelings. It just proves it's hard to understand a place until you've been there.

> Paula: How did the people in Lebanon react to your presence?

> Jackie: They were grateful for the English lessons and appreciated the solidarity we foreigners showed in choosing to live with them.

> Paula: What did you learn about yourself while you were in Lebanon?

> Jackie: I discovered that I can be patient with people who hold views that differ from my own. I see things from other people's perspectives and my understanding of a variety of issues has been broadened. A good example would be the hijab (the head covering some Muslim women wear). I was never strongly opposed to it, but I didn't realize the various meanings and the amount of significance it has for people. The hijab means a variety of things to different people. It's a very complex religious, political, and cultural symbol. It isn't a one-dimensional symbol for being a muslim woman. Now I have a great deal of respect for both women who wear it and those who choose not to. On a lighter note, I learned how to belly dance and folk dance!

> Paula: Did you ever think, "I could die here"? How did you handle that?

> Jackie: One night in South Lebanon I heard an explosion and a lot of anti-aircraft fire when a helicopter attacked a building less than a mile away. The family I was staying with had converted their bomb shelter into a bedroom for me, so technically I was in the safest place in the house, but I just wanted to run upstairs and be with everyone else. I was too scared to leave the shelter, so I just sat there and hoped it would end soon. In the morning I was told that five people had died.

Daily life was even worse than those moments of extreme fear. War isn't just death and destruction. It's children drawing pictures of their villages under attack. It's stopping your car every few kilometers, removing your sunglasses, and speaking to soldiers at checkpoints. It's not having access to your farmland only two kilometers away because it's full of land mines. And it's not seeing your family for years because they live on one side of the military occupied zone and you live on the other. Through it all, however, I was grateful to still find those who spoke and dreamed of peace.

> Paula: How did these experiences change the way you view life in Canada?

> Jackie: They taught me that struggles can be silent and that I'm surrounded by them in Canada. We pay a lot of attention to things that are big and flashy, and wars fall into that category. But there are quieter wars going on in Winnipeg houses and Manitoba communities, and I have become more aware of them. On the other hand, living in South Lebanon made me recognize and value the safety, security, and freedom that I experience in Canada.

> Paula: Moving to England to continue your studies must be quite a departure from your practicum work; what has life been like there?

> Jackie: I experienced more culture shock than I expected. People communicate differently here. At first they struck me as aloof, but then I realized they show their warmth and compassion in different ways.

I thought that studying at an English educational institution would be quite similar to studying at a Canadian university, but I found the University of Winnipeg much more intimate and friendly; students are able to build good relationships with other students and the faculty.

> Paula: What are your plans after you complete your MA?

> Jackie: I've decided to come back to Winnipeg for a year. I don't think I can miss another Folkfest! Then I hope to study Spanish in Mexico and Central America. Eventually I think I'd like to work in advocacy, make a few more trips back to the Middle East, and then finish a PhD and teach—and continue belly dancing! 🇩🇪

PAVING THE WAY FOR WOMEN IN SPORT

"I wore yellow fuzzy slippers to Convocation and I did it for Sandra Kirby," says a proud Lynda Hathout. "In class, Professor Kirby encouraged us to do breach experiments, which involve exhibiting a behaviour outside the norm," she says. When Convocation arrived, she saw a perfect opportunity to put her sociology skills to use. Walking across the stage in a gown and slippers, Hathout elicited an overwhelming response, mostly from her classmates who agreed that yellow fuzzy slippers were a fitting and well-deserved tribute to a professor who is universally admired.

Pushing the limits for girls and women has earned local and national recognition for Kirby. Olympic athlete, marathon canoeist, coach, and feminist, Kirby was honoured with the 2001 Women and Sport Breakthrough Award in the Individual Category. The prestigious Breakthrough Awards were established by the Canadian Association for the Advancement of Women and Sport and Physical Activity (CAAWS) in 1986 to recognize exceptional accomplishments that 'break through' traditional barriers and pave the way for girls and women to participate in sports at every level.

As a researcher and Sociology professor, Kirby has published widely in the area of sexual harassment in sport. Her most recent book, The Dome of Silence: Sexual Harassment and Abuse in Sport (Kirby, Greaves, and Hankivsky, Fernwood, 2000), has had considerable impact on sport in Canada and abroad. "The book shook the sports world," she says. "The nature and the scope of the problem is being recognized as serious; the book is doing its job."

Sandra Kirby says that she is humbled to receive the Breakthrough Award. "I'm in the company of women like Herstory Award winners Helen Lenskyj and Dorothy Richardson. I'm just one of many who are working for important change in sport."

PROVINCE ADVANCING EDUCATION

Premier Gary Doer says that since coming into office this government has clearly demonstrated that post-secondary education and training are top priorities.

"The Province is making a difference in the future by making a difference in education," Manitoba Premier Gary Doer said at a press conference in the Riddell Hall atrium last spring. "We are moving ahead in a positive and optimistic way." The premier and Advanced Education Minister Diane McGifford were on campus to announce that the government is investing $14 million for capital projects at the University of Winnipeg, including the restoration of Wesley Hall.

"We are, of course, delighted with the premier's announcement. It represents a promise kept, and kept under difficult circumstances, confirming once again the government's commitment to post-secondary education," said University of Winnipeg President Constance Rooke. "We appreciate deeply this recognition of the University's needs. I know the help given today, together with the help we will be seeking and urgently need from other friends of the University as plans for our capital campaign unfold, will make a huge difference to our students."

"This is a continuation of our promise to invest in the future of Manitoba," said the premier. "We feel strongly that you can't have an economic strategy without an education strategy. This capital grant builds on our plan to provide all Manitoba students with improved infrastructure, where they can learn comfortably and acquire the best education possible."

Richard Hechter: making science fun.

At first he thought it was an April Fool's joke. "When I answered the phone the woman on the other end asked 'Are you alone?'" recalls Richard Hechter. "I jokingly asked if she wanted to know what I was wearing. Then she told me that I had won a Prime Minister's Award for Teaching Excellence. It took some convincing before I believed it was true."

As Hechter tells the story about this unforgettable day, his sense of humour and playfulness become apparent. Hechter's students know that science class isn't all fun and games, but they sure are the best part. To most people a water slide might not seem like the most traditional place to learn about the laws of physics, but then again, Hechter isn't a traditional teacher. His classroom—whether it's in the telecourse studio, Wesley Hall, or the West Edmonton Mall during one of Hechter's annual field trips—is a place where usually difficult course material is made accessible and enjoyable, where science is fun.

A graduate of both the Collegiate and the University of Winnipeg (Class of 1998), Hechter has adopted a 'students first' philosophy. "Can I get into Mr. Hechter's class, please?" is a question commonly heard at the Collegiate. Even though he teaches some of the most challenging material within the Manitoba high school curriculum, his classes are always subscribed to their maximum capacity. In his three years at the Collegiate, Hechter has increased enrolment across the sciences: enrolment in Grade 11 Biology has almost tripled and the number of students in Physics and Chemistry has more than doubled. Sections are often added to accommodate student demand.

So how has he turned such demanding material into sought after intellectual fare? He contends that it's all in the approach: even his day to day lessons are anything but ordinary. With an emphasis on creative problem-solving, students shed light on the mysteries of science by hitting golf balls, dropping parachutes down stairwells, and utilizing magnets and steel poles, ping pong balls, and probably the largest collection of Hot Wheels in Canada.

But it's more than his creative mind and positive energy that make him popular with students. "Richard treats every student as a true individual—he knows their names, their personal likes and dislikes, and their individual strengths and weaknesses in the classroom," says Michael Fox, Vice-President (Students) and former Dean of the Collegiate. "Richard has three critical components in truly reaching excellence in educating developing minds: a teacher's brain, a teacher's commitment to his craft, and, most importantly, a teacher's heart."

Accolades aside, Hechter says he felt quite humbled accepting the Prime Minister's award. "But I'd be lying if I didn't admit that I was thrilled beyond words to be singled out with this year's other fine recipients. When I met them I was in awe. I learned so much about teaching in the two days we spent together in Ottawa." He adds that what surprised him the most about this group of teachers was how much they had in common. "Everyone had a different perspective and came from a different background, but we were all saying essentially the same things. The bottom line is that we all care about students."

(inset) Dr. Rod Hunter

The University of Winnipeg's third Chancellor (1978-1984) passed away on December 2, 2001.

"In my unprejudiced view his greatest beneficiary has been higher education. In 1936/37 he was student president of Wesley College and in 1939/40 of the University of Manitoba ... At the tender age of 32, he joined the Board of Regents of United College where, he often recalled, the next youngest member was a generation older. There he remained for 19 years, only resigning to become a founding member of the Universities Grants Commission. In 1971 he became an Honorary Doctor of the University of Winnipeg ... His friendship with Sir William Stephenson led to the University's prestigious "Stephenson Award" and he contributed to the institution in every way available to him."

— excerpts from the Eulogy (05/12/01) by President Emeritus Dr. Henry E. Duckworth, O.C.

The University of Winnipeg is profoundly indebted to the memory of Dr. Hunter. He will be missed. A memorial service will be held at the University of Winnipeg in late January.

Contributions in memory of Dr. Hunter may be made to the University of Winnipeg c/o University Relations, 4W21 Wesley Hall, 515 Portage Avenue, Winnipeg, Manitoba R3B 2E9.

TO MAKE A CHANGE

ТЕХТ: Neire Mercer '98 and Paula Denbow фното: grajewski fotograf

“I value the freedom to learn, to explore, and to act on what I believe,” says Economics professor Xiao-Yuan Dong. “We are privileged in Canada to have those freedoms.” For the past several years, Dong has been studying labour market reform in China. Her research has made her acutely aware of the millions of people who do not have the freedoms that define and shape her own life and the lives of other Canadians.

Dong grew up in China, leaving for Canada in 1983 to pursue graduate studies. “Back then, before China undertook economic reforms in the late 1970s, the standard of living was low, but society was more egalitarian,” she confirms. Things have changed, she adds, and that is what inspires and drives her research.

Funded by a Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council (SSHRC) grant and the International Development Research Centre (IDRC), Dong’s research examines the impacts of China’s transition from a centrally planned to a market-oriented economy. “The changes have had a profound effect on the social fabric of the country,” notes Dong. “This is the dimension that I’m concerned with—the human element, the well-being of the Chinese workers.” Dong spent some time in China during the summer, examining first-hand the changes and their effects.

For most Chinese workers, the reforms have brought greater diversification of job opportunities, increased mobility, higher living standards, and more autonomy. But at the same time people are suffering due to heavier pressure for productivity increases, greater insecurity, and in some cases loss of welfare benefits.

To avoid the kind of social and economic infrastructure collapse that happened in the Soviet Union, the Chinese government instituted measures that have given workers more control over conditions in the workplace. Unions formed. Factory workers were given the option to purchase shares in the factory, collective farm workers could lease plots of land, and workers were given incentives for extra production.

Despite these measures, power continues to rest with management. “The underlying problem is the inability of the people to enforce the new labour law,” says Dong. “There is no social safety net in place to protect people from discriminatory wage distribution, poor working conditions, and long hours.”

Dong has observed that, although there has been a general increase in real income, inequalities have widened over time. Polarization began occurring when the Chinese government decided to privatize most of the public enterprises, preparing China for its accession to WTO in the late 1990s. As a result, some managers are becoming very wealthy, while the number of impoverished and unemployed is growing. “Workers can purchase factory shares at a discount rate, but managers get even greater discounts.

“Discrimination against women is also a serious problem,” she reveals. “Because they are not considered equal in the labour force, they are the first to be laid off and the first to get wage reductions.” Dong points out that in the past governments in some rural communities provided care for the aged and infirm using profits from enterprises that were collectively owned by the community. With village enterprises being sold to private investors, this responsibility now falls to the women.

In speaking with Chinese female academics, Dong found that many of them are discouraged from going into the field of economics because of discrimination against women in recruitment, allocation of training opportunities, and promotion. In an effort to close the gender gap in economic research and to raise the general awareness of gender inequality in post-reform China, Dong has made education a priority. With support from the Ford Foundation, she is working with Chinese academics to provide a training program for Chinese female economists and to organize a workshop on economic reforms and gender inequality in China.

Interviewing Chinese workers and working closely with Chinese experts on labour reforms has enabled Dong to get a close and personal look at the needs and concerns of Chinese workers in general and Chinese women in particular. “This subject has such a strong human dimension,” she explains. “Unless you speak directly to the people who are affected, it’s difficult to get a true sense of their concerns and to reflect their attitude in your research.” ■

The Other

Universities are communities where visions are shared, where people learn from and with each other. The recipient of the University's 2001 Distinguished Alumni Award, Winnipeg director Guy Maddin is no stranger to this process.

A LOOK INSIDE THE ECLECTIC MIND OF GUY MADDIN

TEXT: Alison Gillmor '85

Filmmaking is, after all, a highly collaborative art form, in the most exhilarating and exasperating ways.

Most recently, Maddin (Class of 1978) directed a feature-length version of the Royal Winnipeg Ballet's Dracula, which means that he worked with RWB dancers and choreographer Mark Godden, not to mention a lot of eminent dead people. With a story by Bram Stoker, music by Mahler, and sets that pay homage to the architecture of Gaudi, Maddin was surrounded by artistic energy. Then there were the far-flung creative influences that at any given moment are wafted through his mind like absinthe fumes—Goya etchings and Max Ernst collages, the work of the 19th-century Decadents, the silent films of Abel Gance and F.W. Murnau, '40s and '50s potboilers, Z-grade monster movies, Soviet propaganda reels, the writings of Rilke, Kafka, and Nabokov, and pretty much any film with James Mason in it.

e With such a fevered and exotic range of interests, it may come as a surprise that Maddin studied mostly sturdy, sensible subjects at the University of Winnipeg, graduating with a BA in economics. This degree probably doesn't help much with the arbitrary and irrational realm of film funding, but Maddin has found direct applications for his psychology course with Harry Strub. "All my rules of conduct are based on intro psych. I live by negative and positive reinforcement. When I'm working on a film, all my colleagues and I are walking around in a big Skinner Box, just looking for that lever to press so we can get treats. My project for that course was a behaviour modification experiment to stop biting my nails," he recalls, looking ruefully at his ravaged fingers. "They're still a wreck. I think I got a C-."

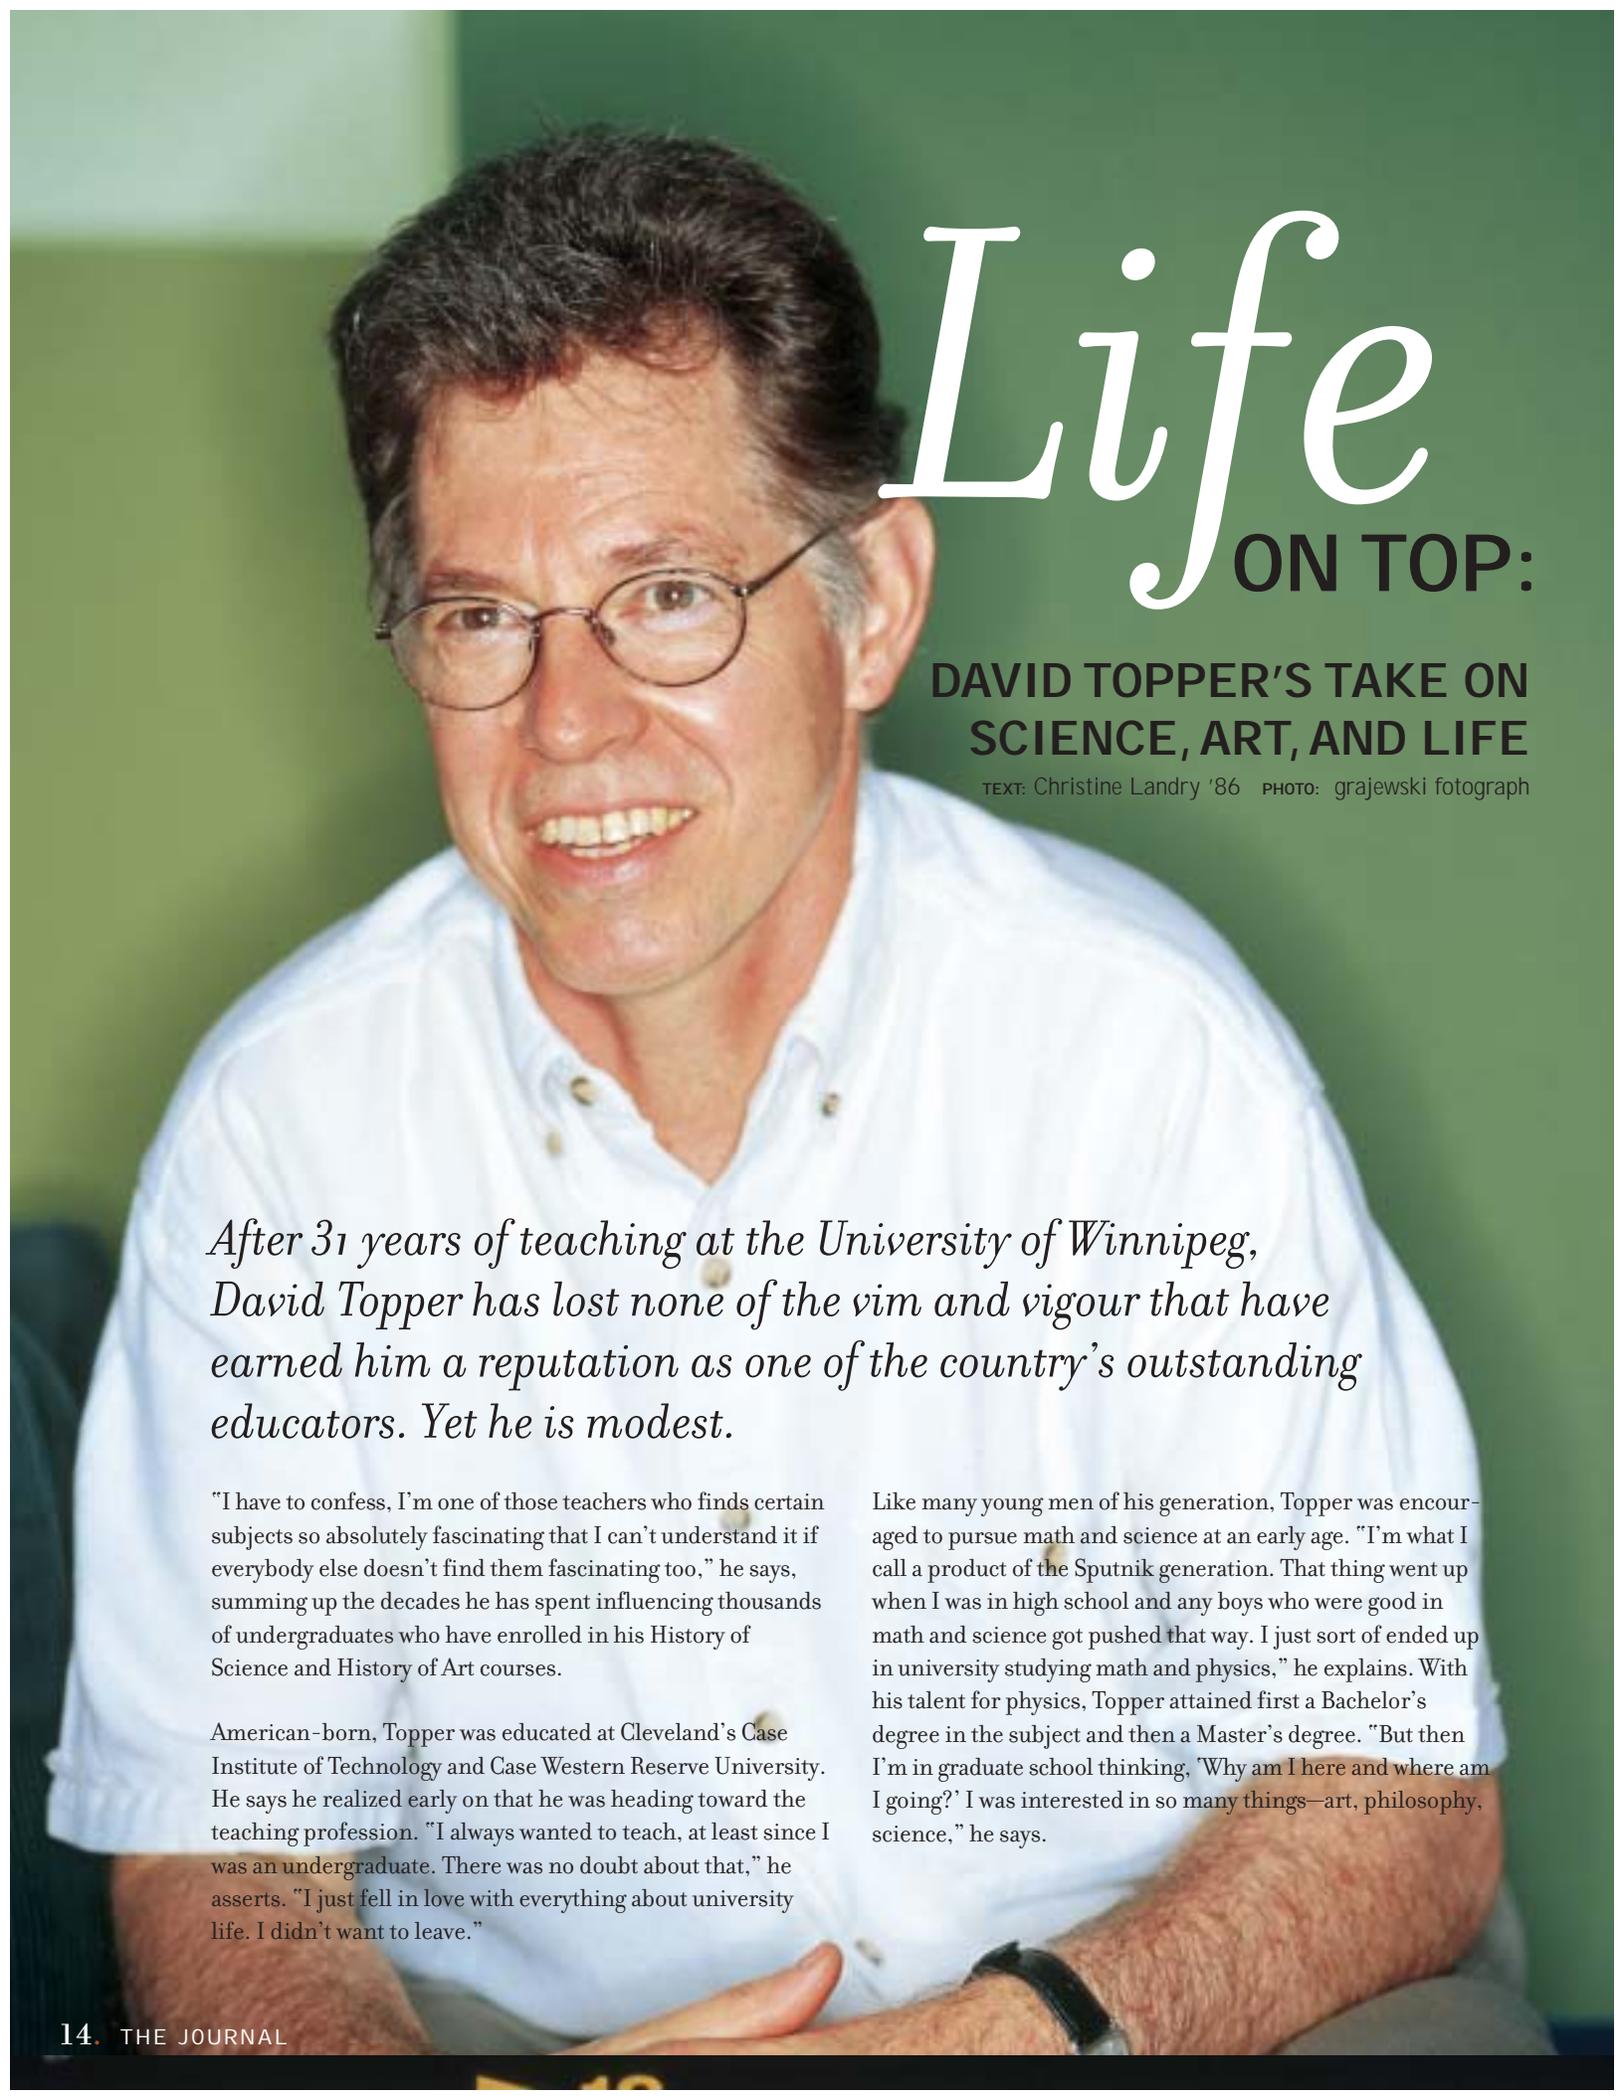

His urge to create—"which is really just half an urge to create and half a narcissistic urge to be adored," as he tells Caelum Vatnsdal in Kino Delirium, a recent study of his life and work—came in 1982 when he started filming a funny Oedipal nightmare called The Dead Father. Since then, films such as Tales From the Gimli Hospital (1988), Archangel (1990), Careful (1992), and Twilight of the Ice Nymphs (1997) have earned him a reputation as a "brilliant Winnipeg fabulist" (The Time Out Movie Guide), a filmmaker of "awesome weirdness" (Geoff Pevere), an artist whose "handmade, toylike cinema of delirium [converts] antiquarianism into novelty, irony into candor, decadence into innocence" (Stuart Klawans).

Maddin's work has been screened at countless international film festivals, at the MOMA in New York, and at this year's inaugural Icelandic-Canadian film festival in Gimli, where he has summered all his life. He became the youngest director ever to receive the Telluride Lifetime Achievement Award, and his recent short film Heart of the World, a visually lush, super-condensed four minutes of obsession and melodrama that premiered at the 2000 Toronto Film Festival, was named top experimental film of the year by the National Society of Film Critics in the United States.

For years Maddin has been collaborating (not to mention feuding, bonding, playing hockey, and watching old movies) with a group of Winnipeg filmmakers and artists affectionately referred to as The Drones. Alongside this creative cross-fertilization with his peers, Maddin has become the unofficial godfather to Prairie Gothic for an upcoming generation of filmmakers; it's a rare aspiring auteur in the Winnipeg community who doesn't make at least one Maddinesque film on the way to artistic maturity.

One collaboration that holds no allure for Maddin, however, is the multi-million dollar pact with the devil that is Hollywood moviemaking. Maddin's biggest budget ever, for Twilight of the Ice Nymphs, turned into his least satisfying artistic experience. "It was like a dictatorship of money," Maddin recalls.

Maddin contends that truly original films are always born of more than one mind. Having just seen the film A.I., which fascinated him because of the collision between cool, detached Stanley Kubrick (who adapted the story) and warm, fuzzy Steven Spielberg (who directed), Maddin has a suggestion for mainstream Hollywood: "Enforced collaboration. They should make directors swap scripts with other, really different directors. That would shake things up a little."

DAVID TOPPER'S TAKE ON SCIENCE, ART, AND LIFE

After 31 years of teaching at the University of Winnipeg, David Topper has lost none of the vim and vigour that have earned him a reputation as one of the country's outstanding educators. Yet he is modest.

"I have to confess, I'm one of those teachers who finds certain subjects so absolutely fascinating that I can't understand it if everybody else doesn't find them fascinating too," he says, summing up the decades he has spent influencing thousands of undergraduates who have enrolled in his History of Science and History of Art courses.

American-born, Topper was educated at Cleveland's Case Institute of Technology and Case Western Reserve University. He says he realized early on that he was heading toward the teaching profession. "I always wanted to teach, at least since I was an undergraduate. There was no doubt about that," he asserts. "I just fell in love with everything about university life. I didn't want to leave."

Like many young men of his generation, Topper was encouraged to pursue math and science at an early age. "I'm what I call a product of the Sputnik generation. That thing went up when I was in high school and any boys who were good in math and science got pushed that way. I just sort of ended up in university studying math and physics," he explains. With his talent for physics, Topper attained first a Bachelor's degree in the subject and then a Master's degree. "But then I'm in graduate school thinking, 'Why am I here and where am I going?' I was interested in so many things—art, philosophy, science," he says.

“Carl and I stood there on the last day of class and the students didn’t want to leave. It was April and it was ‘OK it’s over...’ but they just sat there.”

Certain that he didn’t want a doctorate in physics, but unsure of what he wanted to pursue in its place, Topper chanced upon a class in the History of Science, which allowed him to apply science, with a “humanities flair.”

At ease at last, Topper signed on with the History of Science Faculty and eventually obtained a second Master’s degree and a Doctorate in the subject. Soon after he arrived in Winnipeg, he began his professorial career and the rest, as they say, is history.

The University of Winnipeg allowed Topper to blend his already intense passion for the history of science (he has been known to spend time recreating historical science experiments in his own home and he spends a good deal of time applying his knowledge of astronomy to the prairie skies) with another abiding love—fine art.

Asked to take on a general History of Art class in the early ’70s, Topper agreed and has since witnessed the single course offering evolve into a separate program that offers a major to undergrads.

While art and science are seemingly incongruous to some, Topper has approached the apparent dichotomy with his usual mix of energy and innovation. “I see them as separate areas but I am also interested in how they interact historically,” he says. “I know [students] come to the art course with certain expectations about creativity, which is what art is. But I also present art in a very systematic, rational way. With the history of science I show them that there is a kind of irrational, creative side to scientific enterprise.” As conversation with Topper unfolds, it is not always clear who is getting more out of his classes—the students or Topper himself. He delights in meandering down tangential paths, both in and out of his classes.

Characterizing himself as slightly sarcastic (and not an easy marker), he employs his wry sense of humour and, sometimes, downright silliness to engage his students. Many latecomers to his survey courses can attest to being chased down an aisle by the professor who punishes tardiness by insisting on an answer to one of his questions.

He may refer to such antics as “shtick,” but they have proven effective and infectious enough to warrant two distinguished teaching awards. He won the University of Winnipeg’s Clifford

J. Robson Memorial Award for Excellence in Teaching in 1981 and then the nationally renowned 3M Teaching Fellowship in 1987.

Accolades aside, Topper takes great delight in seeing the proverbial light bulbs switch on above his students’ heads and he is not afraid to take a chance in order to electrify them.

Some particularly fond memories come from a course in the late ’80s that he taught with friend and colleague Professor Carl Ridd, another perennial favourite among students. It was a one-time class—with the heady title of History of Reality—for which they got special permission to teach to a group of advanced students. “We got together during the summer,” says Topper, recalling their initial planning session. “Carl had this whole master plan; he had papers everywhere. I walked in and I didn’t have anything.”

Just how did he plan to proceed with the class, a slightly perplexed Ridd asked.

“I said, ‘I thought that in the first class, we’d blindfold a student, hand the student a text book upside down and have them point and we’d start right there.’ The look on his face—it was ‘What did I get myself into with this crazy Topper guy,’” he says, recalling Ridd’s expression with undisguised glee. But after a moment’s pause Ridd was game. And that’s how the class began. “It worked. I can still remember what the student pointed to,” says Topper.

The student had singled out an illustration in an Irish manuscript from the early Middle Ages. “OK, we’re going to begin with that. You people go and find out everything you can about that,” Topper told the class.

Jumping off from that point, Topper and Ridd led their class through a free-flowing exchange of ideas and explorations on the broad playing field they had named the history of reality. Although unorthodox, even for an advanced class, it proved to be a remarkable experience for professors and students alike. “Carl and I stood there on the last day of class and the students didn’t want to leave. It was April and it was ‘OK it’s over ...’ but they just sat there.”

If a response like that does not mark Topper as the kind of man who possesses both keen intellect and unflappable enthusiasm and who also knows how to use them to inspire his charges, what ever could?

ALUMNI AUTHORS

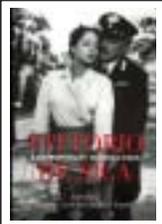

100 YEARS OF GREAT STORIES

As expansive as a prairie sky, as refreshing as a cool breeze on a hot summer day, Great Stories from the Prairies (Red Deer Press) collects the best prairie stories of the last one hundred years. From Frederick Phillip Groves' classic "Snow" to the contemporary delights of Carol Shields' "Mrs. Turner Cutting Grass," prairie writing forms a literary landscape as abundant as the ranchlands, farm fields, forests, and cityscapes it portrays. From rural to urban, classic to modern, native to immigrant, Great Stories from the Prairies creates a mosaic of that most influential literary character—the magnificently diverse prairie landscape.

Great Stories includes "God is Not a Fish Inspector" by W.D. Valgardson BA '61, "Boss in the House" by Armin Wiebe BA '69, "Horses of the Night" by Margaret Laurence BA '47, and "Hey" by David Bergen B.Ed. '85. Editor Birk Sproxtton BA '64 writes, edits, and teaches from the heart of the prairie greenbelt in Alberta. His previous books include The Hockey Fan Came Riding, Headframe, and The Red-Headed Woman with the Black Black Heart, which received the Manitoba Historical Society's award for historical fiction.

FILMMAKING AT ITS FINEST

Regarded as one of Italy's most important filmmakers, Vittorio De Sica (1902-1974) directed the neo-realist classics

Bicycle Thieves (1948) and Umberto D. (1952), as well as popular comedies starring Sophia Loren and Marcello Mastroianni.

Vittorio De Sica: Contemporary Perspectives, edited by Howard Curle BA '70 and Stephen Snyder and published by the University of Toronto Press for its Italian Studies series, features new and old essays about this outstanding artist.

Curle teaches film studies at the University of Manitoba. He has lectured on film at the Winnipeg Art Gallery and the Rady Jewish Community Centre and his book and film reviews have appeared in Border Crossings and Take One magazines.

RETELLING HISTORY

Women played a vital role in the shaping of the "new" West in Canada between 1880 and 1940. Telling Tales: Essays in Western

Women's History (UBC Press) contributes to the rewriting of western Canada's past by integrating women into the shifting power matrix of class, race, and gender that framed its colonization and settlement.

Co-edited by Catherine A. Cavanaugh and Randi R. Warne BA '74, the chapters in this book cover a range of topics—African-American settlement on Vancouver Island, prairie childbirth narratives, and Mennonites as domestic servants are but a few—while addressing the collection's themes of colonization, settlement, and community building. They focus on women of both minority and dominant cultures and reflect the West's characteristically mixed population.

Telling Tales challenges founding myths of the region and invites a retelling of the story of western Canadian colonization and settlement.

Warne teaches in the Department of Religious Studies at Mount St. Vincent University.

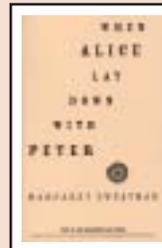

CAN HUMANITY SURVIVE THE TECHNOLOGY IT CREATES?

The ABC of Armageddon: Bertrand Russell on Science, Religion and the Next War, 1919-1938

(SUNY Press) is an exploration of Bertrand Russell's writings during the inter-war years, a period when he advocated 'the scientific outlook' to ensure the survival of humanity in an age of potential self-destruction. Assistant Professor in the Departments of Philosophy, History, and Religious Studies at the University of Winnipeg, Peter Denton

BA (Hons) '80 examines two concerns that were fundamental to Russell's work between 1919 and 1938: the philosophical implications of discoveries in the physical sciences, particularly for the relationship between science and religion, and the grim prospects of an industrial civilization whose science and technology were held responsible for the devastation of the Great War.

In addition to being a seasoned writer and accomplished researcher, Denton is a prolific, award-winning cartoonist.

HISTORY REMEMBERED

When Alice Lay Down With Peter (Knopf Canada) by Margaret Sweatman BA '74 is an erotic, witty, and innovative historical novel.

Alice falls in love with Orkney in the 1860s and follows him to the New World. They join the rebellion against the Canadian acquisition of Manitoba and fight with the charismatic Métis leader Louis Riel. Alice participates in the political execution of Thomas Scott, an odious Orangeman determined to destroy Riel.

Alice lies down with Peter in a storm of lightning and hail, the catalyst for the conception of a daughter, Blondie, the wry narrator of the novel. Blondie lives for 100 years—most of which she spends in love with Eli, the buffalo hunter turned singing cowboy—and her tale covers four generations, three wars, two rebellions, a couple of labour strikes, and countless insurrections.

Always possessed of an eccentric wisdom, inspired by a passionate interest in the transfiguration of things, big and small, this epic novel is about change and the hauntings that reward our choosing to remember our own history.

Sweatman is a playwright, lyricist, and author of two previous novels, Sam and Angie and Fox.
