ABOUT THE PROGRAM

A global, interdisciplinary, professional program, The University of Winnipeg's Master's in Development Practice: Indigenous Development (MDP) teaches you the skills required to be a successful practitioner of sustainable development.

Guided by an understanding of Indigenous principles, experience, knowledge and rights, the University of Winnipeg's Master's in Development Practice: Indigenous Development (MDP) provides you with the range of skills, knowledge and understanding required to effectively practice sustainable development. Culture, identity and the right to self-determination infuse the comprehensive curriculum that includes the environmental and social sciences and health, economic and management disciplines. The 24-month program is eminently practical and experiential learning is a cornerstone. With two field-placements—one in Canada and one international—you have the opportunity to put your learning into practice, gain important applied experience and establish important connections with organizations engaged in Indigenous development around the world. The MDP will uniquely prepare you to be instrumental in reconciliation and to make a positive impact on the broader society and environment.

Curious about how you will do this once you graduate? UWinnipeg's Indigenous Resource Centre provides you with invaluable professional advice for your career transition.

Affect positive change locally and globally as you join a prestigious global network of students, alumni and development organizations linked together by the MDP Secretariat at Columbia University in New York City. With MDP programs on every continent, and collaborating organizations ranging from local and regional governmental and non-governmental public and private organizations, to large, multi-national agencies, you have an instant global network.
