Note: RHET-2246-050 - We're living in the midst of an epoch-making media revolution today, as screens and images displace the printed text from whence came the culture of the book. Will book culture disintegrate, or become dangerously enfeebled? Will an image-based culture advance the Enlightenment project or drastically curtail it? Will entertainment overwhelm education? Will learning and individuality and democracy thrive in the new electronic culture, or will they suffer catastrophic regressions? We'll try to answer these questions as we survey the major media in human history.

Note: RHET-2250-001 - This course examines the relationship between the rise of new media and the emergence of popular culture. The course looks at changing rhetorics of taste, from the nineteenth to the twentieth century, as new media made art and culture more widely accessible to a broader public. The course considers how the new processes of mediated distribution of art changed the way we understand popular culture, today. Topics in this course include: the rise of photography and the technological reproducibility of images; mass media and the culture industry; technology and globalization; augmented reality, video games, and the relationship between media and the body.

Note: RHET-3156-050 - The course looks at the origins and development of language from a historical perspective and moves into specific case studies of unilingual, bilingual, and multilingual groups, their languages, how they communicate, and representational media used by the group. We focus closely on how groups communicate with one another, often by using common languages and the practice of translation, and how groups use languages to represent their culture to other groups and within the group. Central to such transnational and intercultural communication is the representation of identity and heritage, and therefore as languages change, identity changes also occur.

Note: RHET-3236-001 - About 2700 years ago, Greeks invented the first real alphabet. Did human consciousness change when they and other "oral" peoples became literate? Did a new sense of independent selfhood emerge because of writing? Did the new literacy provoke a great transformation in human thought? Did literacy make abstract cognition far more convenient, and far more common? Did Western culture evolve in a creative tension between oral and literate styles of personality? Are movies and electronic media renewing orality in Western cultures, and creating a literacy crisis? These are tantalizing questions suggested by the study of orality, and we will take them up intermittently throughout the course, and systematically near the end of it. We'll begin with Neil Postman's Amusing Ourselves to Death, and consider the larger theoretical questions mentioned above. We'll continue with Homer's Odyssey, the greatest oral artefact in the Western tradition, and essentially a piece of Greek popular cultu
